DESIGN IN MILWAUKEE

Steering a space from concept to completion requires managing multiple moving parts across a wide range of specialties. Well versed in the inner workings of remodels and new construction, designer Lisa Mohindroo always begins with a plan constructed from conversation.

“I ask about everything—their wants and needs for the space, how they entertain, how many pets and how many family members,” says Mohindroo, whose precise process has been honed over more than 15 years in the design industry. “Our firm has even designed a house for a

6-foot-7-inch-tall brother-in-law who visits on Thanksgiving.”

After absorbing, then neatly organizing, this abundant information, she crafts a roadmap that keeps builders, contractors, and the rest of the crew on course. From reviewing architectural plans to placing the final furnishings, she proceeds with precision. Complementing this managerial mastery is her penchant for color, texture, and print—elements Mohindroo loves to incorporate into her transitional interiors.

A recent renovation that was down to the studs was a dream realized for a family with two children. Moving the laundry room from the downstairs kitchen up a floor next to the main suite provided much-needed function for the family of four. The team also incorporated beautiful woods and textured wallpapers that brought visual interest to the black-and-white palette found throughout the home.

“Design is more than creating beautiful spaces,” Mohindroo says. “It changes how people interact with each other. Seeing the joy we bring to clients, and how that joy is transferred to their loved ones, is a great experience.”
